Christmas Eve, 1910

My Darling:

There are no words, at my command, sufficient to say the full extent of my love for you — a mad, tender, devoted, ardent, eager, passion-wild, jealous, reverent, mistful, hungry, happy love — unspeakably encompassing, immeasurably absorbing, unendingly worshipping, unconsciously exalting, unwillingly exacting, involuntarily excluding, ~~overlastingly~~ ~~encompassing~~ — all the love a man can know and feel and endure, and gladly, oh, so gladly give. It flames like the fire and consumes; then cools to sweet repentance and soothes in blessedness. It racks in the tortures of aching hunger, and glows in bliss ineffable — bliss you only can give. It is the prayer and benediction of my heart, the surpassing passion of my body, the ambition and consecration of my mind, and the hope and heaven of my soul. I love you thus, and more. I love you more than all the world, and have no hope of reward, on earth or hereafter, so precious as that in your dear arms, on your thrilling lips, on your matchless breasts, in your incomparable embrace. To have and to hold you, is happiness to you, reluctantly, in satisfaction and satisfied love, mine to the triumph of living and loving.
